

Unexpected Blessings

This image popped up on a news channel. It is a recent find in Borrowdale – and probably a new Banksy sculpture. He is world-known for making social statements in graffiti art – but also for unusual sculptures in unexpected places. This one speaks of corporate balance – the impossible arch made possible by the neighbourly support of the slates either side.

Where might we be in the land of making the impossible possible? Which neighbours do we link with to create a strong arch?

What for you is a crucial arch in your life, which allowed you to be strong enough to holdfast against the gravity of a situation? Who helped to make that arch which supported you?

Blessed are old stones and unseen bridge builders, visionaries and silent construction workers in communities: they open new ways of seeing life.
